Graphene edge/substrate adhesion and weak bonding and its competition with metal/oxide for high performance graphene-based devices. Graphene as an electronic material has recently attracted many researchers due to its high electronic mobility, which is twice that of silicon. Its existence on certain substrates is important because it can be used in many different applications, including sensors, field-effect transistors, and energy-related and even biomedical devices. Therefore, it is important to investigate which substrate is more suitable for graphene due to the difference in its performance. The different substrates investigated include SiO₂, Si, Cu, Al, Al₂O₃, Ti, f678ea9f9e
